What is a Receivership?

A receivership is a court proceeding. In a receivership, a court appoints someone to take control of the property of one of the parties to a case, typically a defendant or multiple defendants. When appointed, the receiver steps into the shoes and exercises, exclusively, all of the rights relating to the property placed into his or her hands. The defendant (or other person) is generally excluded from exercising any ownership rights and must defer to the receiver. Sometimes a receiver is placed into general control of categories of property and then is obligated to investigate and report to the court on the specific assets that are located within each category. Receivership property is not limited to things like land, buildings, cars, money and jewelry. Receivership property also includes legal rights, management rights, legal claims against third persons, documents, information, electronic data, accounts, passwords, and other things that are necessary for the receiver to fully perform his or her job. That job ultimately is to locate, preserve and/or liquidate the assets of the receivership entity and to distribute the proceeds as directed by the Court, under the oversight and direction of the court.

Does this mean Premier Global is going out of business?
